ARCHIVES REPORT/ CHRONIQUES D'ARCHIVES

Recent Acquisitions at the National Archives of Canada

Peter DeLottinville

THE NATIONAL ARCHIVES OF CANADA continues to acquire and preserve a wide variety of archival documentation relating to the history of labour unions, federal government involvement in labour relations, and other nationally significant organizations and individuals affecting the lives of working men and women.

Since Danny Moore's report in Labour/Le Travailleur, 10 (Autumn 1982), significant additions have been made to the labour archives programme of the Manuscript Division. This report highlights recent acquisitions received from private sources over the past five years. Many of these accessions are not yet fully arranged and described, and several collections have restrictions on public access. For further details, researchers are asked to contact the National Archives of Canada before planning their research trip.

Additional reports on new acquisitions from the Government Archives Division will appear in the next issue of Labour/Le Travail, as well as reports from other archival repositories across the country. Following this report is that of the Moving Image and Sound Archives of the NAC.

Labour History Holdings at the National Archives of Canada in Oral History

Introduction

THE PURPOSE OF THIS INVENTORY is to highlight those collections that pertain to labour in the Moving Image and Sound division of the National Archives of Canada. While of potential interest to all those involved in labour research, these sources will be particularly valuable to those who plan to work in an audio, video or film medium. While some of these collections form part of larger collections which are listed in other divisions of the National Archives, many are unique and can only be accessed in the Moving Image and Sound division.

For reasons of time and space the definition of labour was limited to those collections which were completely devoted to this subject or contained significant identifiable sections on this subject. Items on labour scattered throughout large collections were not identified and therefore labour holdings within the collections of three major political parties are not included here. Researchers seeking more detail on these and other holdings should consult the Inventory of the Collections of the National Film, Television and Sound Archives published by Supply and Services Canada in 1983 and available in most libraries.

It is recommended that all entries be read completely as the name of the collection may not reflect its contents as is frequently the case with oral history collections which are listed under the name of the interviewer, and not the interviewee or the topic. Also, it should be noted that while most collections are open for consultation, restrictions may exist for some individual items and it is recommended that researchers consult the more detailed finding aid available for each collection at the National Archives or contact the Public Service section in advance at (613) 995-1313 to check particular restrictions and to make any appointment for auditioning and viewing. Once copyright is cleared, researchers can obtain copies of documents by providing their own blank tape; but should be prepared to wait for

230 LABOUR/LE TRAVAIL

3 to 4 weeks for delivery. Unfortunately, reference facilities are only available Monday to Friday 8:00 am to 5:00 pm.

One final note. Many valuable collections in this inventory have been deposited by persons researching the labour movement or working within it. The National Archives encourages all readers of Labour/Le Travail to notify us of potential valuable collections in the fields of oral history, broadcast, or audio-visual records. The Moving Image and Sound division can arrange for a donor copy of the collection in return for deposit and can offer other incentives such as a tax credit or direct purchase if the collection is catalogued in advance by the donor. Please contact the Moving Image and Sound division of the National Archives for further information about these acquisition arrangements.
