Two Renaissance Friends: Baldassarre Castiglione, Domizio Falcone, and Their Neo-Latin Poetry.

At the very beginning of his introduction to this edition and translation of the two poets, Rodney Lokaj alludes to the socio-linguistic phenomenon of diglossia that is much discussed in linguistic circles at the present day. The coexistence of Latin and Italian in the Renaissance is the perfect example of this cultural situation. Although the vernacular literature had already made great strides of its own, the rich patrimony of classical Latin poetry continued to be the inspiration of a vast body of Renaissance Latin poetry in Italy. Castiglione is a very good example of this bilingual fluency. In my opinion he is a better poet in Latin than in Italian, yet his Latin poetry has been unjustly neglected even in Italy, where, as Lokaj points out, the UTET edition of Castiglione's Opera omnia includes only one of his twenty-two Latin poems. A projected second volume of Poeti del Cinquecento, dedicated to the Latin poetry of that period—from the distinguished publishing house Riccardo Ricciardi—had been assigned to the brilliant scholar, Giovanni Parenti, professor of humanistic philology at the University of Florence. Sadly, Parenti died suddenly at the age of 53. We do possess, however, his superb edition, translation, and commentary of four poems of Castiglione: the famous bucolic elegy, Alcon, the equally famous Cleopatra, based on a statue thought to represent her but actually a representation of the sleeping Ariadne, and two other less famous compositions, a Prosopopoeia Ludovici Pici Mirandulani and a poem to his wife, Ippolita Torelli. Fortunately, we now have the texts of the remaining poems as well in the present work, based on a little-known edition of M. Scorsone, which reproduced the 1773 Volpi edition, collated with various Cinquecento editions, and also including many of the emended readings of Parenti for the poems he edited.

The edition of the poems of Domizio Falcone, a friend of Castiglione from the same town of Casatico near Mantua where Castiglione was born, is an important new contribution to the studies of Neo-Latin poetry. Although of lowly estate, Falcone studied Latin with Castiglione under Giorgio Merula, an irritable but learned scholar, and Greek under Demetrius Chalcondylas.

His poems are transmitted in five manuscripts, always directly following the poems of Castiglione. One of these manuscripts, Vat. Lat. 6250, the one that contains the greatest number of compositions of Falcone, is very difficult to read, a factor that necessitated quite a few emendations and reconstructed verses in the present edition. It will require further work, no doubt, to interpret certain passages. There are seventy-nine poems in all, divided up into three sections based on thematic material: De amore sive de Paula, De variis, and Priapeia. The poems of Falcone are much inferior in form to the elegant verse of Castiglione. They exhibit some strange rhythms, anacolutha, and frequent instances of hyperbaton, or transposed word order. The Priapean verses are quite innocuous, typical of this goliardic pastime of the period.

It must be said in all honesty that there are many mistranslations and even more awkward, eccentric translations of the texts to be found in the present edition. To give but a few examples, in poem 25 of Falcone, tempora floribus corona (crown my head with flowers) comes out as “in the garland of flowers on my head,” where the imperative corona is taken as a noun. In the famous pastoral elegy to Falcone, Alcon, the vocative miser, addressed to the deceased Alcon, is translated “my poor dear,” which in the context is pure bathos. Poem 3, consisting of two distichs, had been consistently omitted in all the humanistic editions of Castiglione’s Latin works, but was resurrected by Parenti in a Festschrift in 1996, which was not available to me. It should have been omitted here since its provenance is very suspicious and its content and style simply too vile and crude to have been written by the Mantovan nobleman. It poses as a sequel to the previous poem about a heroic Pisan female warrior defending her city against the Florentines. Seeing her lying there pierced by a sword and dying, her lover “proffers the pitiful words, ‘Alas! You should have been pierced by a very different weapon.’” Pitiful indeed. To make things worse, Lokaj adds a pedantic commentary. A simple Latin expression, accurrit propere (he hastens quickly), is glossed with a sentence from Tacitus’s Histories which has nothing to do with this scene, while the patent double entendre of the word telum, Latin for “weapon,” generates a series of glosses from Martial and the Corpus Priapeorum, an anonymous collection of phallic obscenities.

The commentary, in general, is full of interesting and pertinent information, even if at times it may be somewhat excessive. To explain a single allusion to a classical poet, an entire passage of a dozen verses or so is sometimes cited. This will be a very useful book to students of Castiglione and Renaissance Latin poetry.

The latest volume in The Other Voice in Early Modern Europe's Toronto Series is a welcome addition to a series that has published an impressive forty-four editions of early modern women's texts since 2009. Educating English Daughters, edited by Frances Teague and Margaret Ezell with Jessica Walker as associate editor, makes available in an attractive teaching edition two works: Bathsua Makin's The Ancient Education of Gentlewomen (1673) and Mary More's The Woman's Right (ca. 1674). The former appeared in print, while the latter circulated in manuscript and was preserved in a volume compiled by Robert Whitehall alongside his own refutation of More's tract, The Woman's Right Proved False, which is included as the third edited text in Teague and Ezell's book.

The general introduction clearly lays out the history of women's education in theory and practice. The editors argue for the importance of their chosen writers as articulating views that anticipate Enlightenment thinking. They outline classical and medieval views that women were inferior to men on physical, intellectual, and moral levels, views that continued to be expressed in the works of male humanists. And they explain the ways in which past scholarship underestimated women's literacy rates—pointing out that more women could read than could write, that Protestants promoted Bible reading, and that manuscript writing was widespread. The introduction also explains the mechanics of schooling (from private tutors for the elite to the growth
