shorelines

a boy wakes from a dream of drowning his skin is blue he is coughing up water and jellyfish his mother throws her arms around him holds his head above the waves their tears are saltwater pools a man dreams himself awake after a lifetime of bleeding he pulls a fishhook from his chest laughs for the first time he can remember starfish fall from his mouth into a black sea

a spirit shivers into being takes the form of a baby boy swims from his mother's embrace into the belly of a whale gulping air he swallows starlight until he becomes everything he clenches a grain of sand in his fist an old man plunges into sleep his eyes are pearls set in abalone he breathes sandcastles and lightning wrestles misheu-pisheu to floor his wife waves from the shore builds an inukshuk with her bones and exhales a stone labyrinth he has found his way home
