Résumé de l'article

La déclaration de David Cronenberg, « Le film est amusant, là où le livre ne l'est pas vraiment » (1997), crée un paradoxe fascinant dans son adaptation de Crash de J. G. Ballard. Par cette affirmation Cronenberg s'avère être un lecteur à la fois perspicace et superficiel de Ballard. Son adaptation choisit de rester fidèle à plusieurs égards, gardant en particulier les nuances d'humour subtile du roman, souvent ignorées par le réalisateur, le public et les critiques. Paradoxalement, la réception du film a davantage masqué cet aspect de l'oeuvre. L'article examine les mécanismes de l'humour dans Crash, en utilisant les théories de Freud et Bergson qui associent l'humour au soulagement des tensions et à la correction des comportements sociaux. Il souligne les spéculations absurdes des personnages de Ballard et sa narration détachée, juxtaposés à une violence poétique, tandis que Cronenberg transmet l'humour à travers des performances dépourvues d'affect, des scènes de sexe désenchantées et l'autoréférentialité, exposant l'artifice cinématographique. L'article examine les mécanismes de la satire chez Ballard et de la parodie chez Cronenberg, en particulier dans leur rapport aux tableaux vivants. Le roman joue plus sur les conventions du mélodrame, là où le film se présente plus comme un commentaire méta-cinématographique d'Hollywood et du genre du road movie. L'article remet en question l'idée que l'humour doit être léger ou affirmatif, soutenant que le rire troublant et avant-gardiste dans Crash (1973, 1996) incite à réfléchir sur les impacts de la technologie sur l'identité. En définitive, reconnaître la comédie noire dans Crash et son adaptation met en lumière leur commentaire culturel persistant sur la déshumanisation plutôt que la glorification de la pathologie des personnages.

Reading Humor in David Cronenberg's Crash

ABSTRACT

*David Cronenberg's statement that "The film is funny, the book is not very funny" (1997) presents a captivating paradox regarding his adaptation of J. G. Ballard's Crash. This statement reveals Cronenberg as both an insightful and superficial reader of Ballard. His film adaptation chooses to remain faithful to many aspects of the source material and retains the subtle undercurrents of humor found in the book, often overlooked and unrecognized by both the director and audiences, as well critics. Paradoxically, the film's reception has further obscured this aspect of his work. The paper delineates the mechanics of humor in Crash, applying Freudian and Bergsonian theories linking humor to anxiety relief and behavioral correction. It spotlights Ballard's absurd character speculations and detached narrative voice juxtaposing poetic violence, while Cronenberg conveys humor via affectless performances, anti-climactic sex, and self-referential jokes exposing cinematic artifice. Further analysis explores Ballard's satire through the parody of melodramatic tableaux versus Cronenberg's meta-cinematic parody of Hollywood and the road movie genre, noting that the adaptation compresses the novel's sociopolitical critique but expands its intertextuality. The article challenges assumptions that humor must be light or affirming, arguing that the unsettling, avant-garde laughter in Crash (1973, 1996) compels reflection on technology's impacts on identity. Ultimately, recognizing the dark comedy in Crash and its adaptation illuminates their lingering cultural commentary on dehumanization rather than celebrating the pathology of the characters.*

Introduction

Reporting on the reception of Crash (1973), Roger Luckhurst stresses the ongoing debate concerning James G. Ballard's novel. Hailed by some as a cautionary tale for the incisive nature of its prose and its formal breakthrough, Crash has also been abhorred and dismissed for its amorality or even its immorality¹. Jean Baudrillard's enthusiastic response to the novel in his Simulacra and Simulation made Crash a landmark in postmodernist circles due to its groundbreaking depiction of the human condition in late capitalist society² (an academic appropriation of the book that horrified Ballard³). Further shock and controversy came with David Cronenberg's adaptation in 1991, which received a Special Jury Prize "For Originality for Daring and for Audacity" at Cannes, while some judges were absent or left prematurely. The film rated NC-17 in the U.S. and 18 in the U.K. and faced distribution delays. The phrase "beyond psychiatric help" emerged from a publisher's rejection letter addressed to Ballard, while "beyond the bounds of depravity" headlined Alexander Walker's critique in the Evening Standard. Crash (Cronenberg, 1991) became controversial for its lack of a moral framework⁴ and its depiction of a bleak, everyday life⁵. Cronenberg himself described the film as "anti-pornographic⁶," focusing more on the themes of the "death of affect"⁷ and the depletion of bourgeois life than on sexual arousal. The film's portrayal of sexuality intertwined with themes of self-annihilation, reflecting the decline of the civilizing process and the failure of myth-making mechanisms in late capitalist society. Crash is, to a certain extent, a film about the end of culture and history, a narrative of stillbirth rather than regeneration in a society obsessed with catastrophe and self-annihilation (Brottman and Sharrett, 2002).

In his response, Ballard decries the intellectual over-analysis afflicting science fiction, arguing this once "exhilarating and challenging entertainment" has been diminished into a heavily scrutinized academic discipline—a transmutation he likens to the "apotheosis of the hamburger" (ibid.). While acknowledging the brilliance behind Baudrillard's other critically acclaimed postulations, Ballard admits his disinterest in postmodern musings on his novel, charging postmodern theory with imperiling science fiction's essence—its theoretical imposition overcomplicating and threatening the vital core of the genre.

Visually, Crash is Cronenberg's most minimalist and "high modernist" film, with its polished look and precisely composed shots⁸. Ballard's novel has an unmistakable storyboard quality and reads as if it were meant to be adapted, yet it seems so difficult to film⁹. In both Ballard's novel and Cronenberg's adaptation, the narrative centers around a protagonist named James Ballard (James Spader), who survives a catastrophic car crash. This event awakens an obsessive fascination with the eroticism and violence of car accidents. The protagonist's life becomes entangled with several key figures: Vaughan (Elias Kostas), a charismatic individual orchestrating re-enactments of famous car crashes; Dr. Helen Remington (Holly Hunter), the widow of the man killed in the protagonist's crash, with whom he forms asexual relationship; Catherine (Deborah Kara Unger), the protagonist's wife, who becomes drawn into this world of eroticized car crashes—James tries to initiate his wife Catherine into this world by crashing her car; and Colin Seagrave (Peter MacNeill), a stunt driver involved in Vaughan's dangerous re-enactments. These characters form a nexus of relationships fueled by their shared fixation on the destructive and erotic nature of car accidents. Their interactions explore the boundaries of conventional sexuality, meshed with themes of technology, violence, and desire, painting a provocative and disturbing picture of human obsession.

adaptation regarding humor¹⁰. He mentioned that when he first read the novel, he found it quite disturbing as it had “zero humor” and no self-awareness. (Cronenberg 2019, 13’32”). This statement reveals Cronenberg as both an insightful and superficial reader of Ballard. His film adaptation remains faithful to the source material, retaining the subtle undercurrents of the humor found in the book, often overlooked and unrecognized by both the director and audiences, as well as critics.

In the context of art criticism, humor is analyzed not only for its entertainment value but also for its ability to provide insights into the human condition, social norms, and cultural contexts. Among the numerous theories of humor, I will engage with the three that have been most influential in art criticism and analysis: the Relief Theory¹¹, the Superiority Theory¹² and the Incongruity Theory¹³.

Christian Metz posits that film privileges the syntagmatic, or horizontal axis, which deals with the flow of images and scenes in time, over the paradigmatic, or vertical axis, which involves the selection of signifying elements that could potentially replace each other within the narrative¹⁴. As the analysis will confirm, in literature, humor can be deeply intertwined with the narrative and character development, relying heavily on the paradigmatic choices of language and narrative style. Film, however, conveys humor through the syntagmatic progression of visual and auditory elements, including timing, physical comedy, visual gags, and dialogue delivery.

The purpose of this essay is, first, to reveal the mechanisms that make reading the humor in both works challenging. Secondly, it will present and analyze the different approaches to humor and how they relate to questions of genre and medium in the novel and Cronenberg's adaptation. Finally, it will consider the implications of re-reading humor in the two works in a contemporary context.

The Challenge of Reading Humor in Crash

The reception of Ballard's novel and Cronenberg's adaptation clearly indicate a reluctance or a resistance to see humor in them. Ballard uses satire, clashes of tone and content, and exaggerations of violence and sexuality to provoke dark, unsettling humor. The clinical prose and poetic style add to the absurdity of the first-person narrative. But why has reading humor in Crash (both the film and the adaptation) proved so challenging? Is it because of their content? Or because the authorial moral intention has, in both cases, been carefully concealed, suppressed, or wiped out? Many interpretations of the novel and the film¹⁵ over-emphasized the literal collusion of human bodies and technologies¹⁶ and failed to point out that they also function on a symbolic level, borrowing from the strategies of hyperrealism¹⁷. Readers find it difficult to come to terms with the novel, probably because of its central metaphor—that of the car as a means of sexual fulfillment¹⁸. The characters fetishize¹⁹; they literalize the metaphor and become trapped in reproducible images. While the affectless interactions that occur between the characters have abundantly been discussed, it has not been pointed out that it is possible to understand the body-car collusion as a literalization of pathological thought processes.

¹⁴ Metz, Christian, Film Language: A Semiotics of the Cinema, Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1974.

¹⁶ Cronenberg, David, "Braking and Entering: Director David Cronenberg on His Austere and Unnerving J. G. Ballard Adaptation, Crash," Filmmaker Magazine, Winter 1997, <https://filmmakermagazine.com/110818-david-cronenberg-crash/> (accessed Nov. 2023). Cronenberg's interpretation aligns with this idea, as suggested by his interview published in the Filmmaker Magazine shortly after his film was released: "the film works on such a non-literal level that it is really irrelevant. What Ballard is saying is not that car crashes are sexy. It's that there is a deeply hidden erotic element to the event of the car crash. I believe that is true, and that is what we are talking about in the movie" (np).

If we start by taking a Freudian approach²⁰ to humor, it is possible to find examples both in the novel and its adaptation of how humor works as a coping and protective mechanism for dealing with its disturbing themes. In Chapter 20, for instance, the narrator describes how Vaughan humorously speculates about the sexual preferences and habits of famous figures:

“...Monroe masturbating or Oswald saying left- or right-handed, which would you guess? And what instrument panels? Was orgasm reached more quickly with a recessed or overhanging binnacle? Vinyl colour-contouring windshield glass these are factors. Garbo and Dietrich there's a place for the gerontological approach. The special involvement of at least two of the

Kennedys with the automobile..." Always he deliberately side-stepped into self-parody (p. 151).

Such playful and absurd speculations, augmented by the narrator's pointed emphasis, do provide a momentary Freudian relief from the novel's otherwise dark and heavy content. Cronenberg does not fail to notice that and features several moments in the adaptation where tension is purposefully relieved. When Ballard and Helen first have sex, Helen must get rid of a cigarette butt and then struggles to wriggle herself into position in the car for a sex act that lasts a few seconds (23'11"). The awkward and banal elements of the scene make it anticlimactic before it cuts to another sex scene between Ballard and his wife, which, in the comfort of their home, seems much more satisfying (24'53").

Henri Bergson's perspective on humor and comedy (belonging to the incongruity tradition) is intricately woven into the fabric of social functionality, necessitating an inherent adaptability to the ever-evolving tapestry of societal contexts. Bergson identifies "mechanical inelasticity" or rigid and repetitive behavior, as central to humor, contrasting with classical theories that saw comedy as ridiculing supposed inferiors²¹. In his typology, the main varieties of the comic involve repetition²², inversion²³, and reciprocal interference of events or ideas. He links humor more to the notion of incongruity when behavior fails to adapt to norms of social interaction.

In the novel, the disconnection between the horrific subject matter and the blasé prose creates a darkly humorous incongruity, abundant throughout. Characters have emotionless sex at crash sites amid impassive crowds (Chapter 18), while the narrator provides oddly specific details and absurd stereotypes²⁴. This incongruity arises because the narrative's mechanical and emotionless description clashes with the reader's expectations of a more empathetic or horrified response to such situations. In the film, most sex scenes verge on the ²¹ Bergson, Henri, "Laughter" in Comedy, Sypher, Wylie (ed.), Baltimore and London: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1956.

comic effect, as they are performed mechanically without intimacy or aborted mid-act. Two other examples highlight “mechanical inelasticity.” First, when James accompanies Helen to Seagrave’s squalid and gloomy apartment. Along with Vaughan, Vera (Cheryl Swarts) and Gabrielle (Rosanna Arquette), they are sitting in the living room watching a safety video about car crashes as they become aroused (48’02”). At one point in the video (49’08”), the image freezes. Vaughan moves on to talk about the material he is accumulating for his book on car crashes, but Helen is clearly distressed. She stands up abruptly, pushing the table in front of her, and the cutlery falls to the floor. She starts looking for the remote control and says, “Where is it? I’m sure we see this again in slow motion, closer I mean. In detail” (49’39”). The character has trouble coping with the interruption, finding solace only when the video resumes. The humor of the scene is amplified by the other characters’ reactions to her discomfort, which they clearly find excessive. Notably, Helen does not display any distress in the previous scene when sex with James is interrupted in the car park (47’03”). Second, when James takes Gabrielle to the annual auto show (1h11’56”-1h14’09”). Gabrielle, who is physically disabled due to a car crash and wears steel braces that restrain her movement, uses her maimed body to unsettle the salesman (Judah Katz). The scene humorously underscores the salesman’s inability to adapt to Gabrielle’s unconventional interaction with the cars. James and Gabrielle are amused at his awkward attempts to assist, despite her deliberate provocations. At the same time, the concept of “mechanical inelasticity” becomes ironic and ambivalent, as the characters are eager to adapt to the car and fuse with technology.

Chapter 23 concludes with the narrator spreading his semen on crashed cars at a wrecking yard. A solemn, symbolic, and yet bizarrely transgressive act, due to the extreme juxtaposition of human intimacy with the cold, mechanical nature of wrecked cars. This adds an irrational and humorous element to the narrative: by placing human sexual expression in a context of destruction and decay, it challenges the sanctity often attributed to it. Similarly, in Chapter 12, the narrator and others engage in mechanical and unfeeling sex as crash test dummies, which mix absurdism and humor. Semen, as a filmic element, is often not shown and is used as a symbol of the unwatchable²⁵. However, Cronenberg turns this into a scene in which Ballard, after having sex with Vaughan (1h18’06”), goes to a crashed car, gets in, and puts his hands on the steering wheel, arousing himself (1h20’51”). Suddenly, Vaughan crashes his car twice, interrupting him almost as a joke (1h22’56”).

Bergson maintains that laughter serves as a societal corrective, but both works provocatively lack that clear moral scope. Freud's relief theory of humor suggests that humor should introduce a certain level of comfort for the reader or audience. But this is certainly not the dominant type of humor in the two works, and while Ballard has wielded a broader tonal palette in his oeuvre, Cronenberg has made discomfort one of his artistic traits. The novel transitions from disgust to humor in a grotesque manner. Humor in the novel arises from the coexistence of incongruous ideas, with disgust serving as a gateway to comedy²⁶. This mode is Cronenberg's artistic territory, which is why his public comments overlooking humor in the novel seem so curious. When he released Crash, he was already [k]nown as a master of comically grotesque horror films that delve deeply into paranoia, technological obsession, and the impasses of gender difference, Cronenberg's films have almost always involved the suspension of ordinary reality, usually occurring when a fantastic or impossible physical aberration, abnormality, or alien presence invades human life²⁷.

In their joint interview after the film's release, Cronenberg invites Ballard to comment on his description of the book as "a cautionary tale" in the preface to the French edition²⁸:

I mean, it's one of those where the writer, or the filmmaker, plays the devil's advocate, right? And completely adopts this, you know, what seems to be an insane or perverse logic in order to make a larger point. Swift did it in "A Modest Proposal"²⁹ (8'18").

Satire and the Superiority Theory share a bond through mocking perceived flaws to spark amusement. As conceptualized by Hobbes, finding humor in an inferior target's deficiencies mirrors satire's scornful parody unveiling absurdities. However, Swiftian satire aims to foster wisdom in readers, not just attack targets³⁰. It uses parody as an element of satire in a destructive/constructive double movement (Suarez, 2003, p. 115-116). Two main forms of parody can be highlighted: “transplanting” source material to alter meaning³¹, and “imitation” to exaggerate flaws³². In addition, Swift’s fictional personas and parody display the opposite of truth, forcing readers to remain vigilant against deception and gullibility (ibid., p. 121-123). Swift also parodies himself, calling his own authority into question (ibid., p. 125). The novel and the film’s ambiguity surrounding the object of parody, contrasted with Swift’s directness, stems from their layered meanings and subtle critiques. Their layered irony demands discernment to unravel the parodic web, compelling broader engagement.

The novel embraces celebrity culture, technological obsession, and media sensationalism to an extreme extent. Chapter 10 mocks the arrogance of intellectuals through Vaughan’s bizarre surveys, while Chapter 14 ridicules celebrity culture and obsession with public death through Vaughan’s aim to fatally crash with Elizabeth Taylor. Cinema’s role in shaping personal and societal identity is pivotal. As Scott Bukatman has argued, “cinematic style [has] become a part of social and gestural rhetoric, an integral part of the presentation of self in the era of terminal identity³³.” Ballard and Cronenberg take a core metaphor and make contemporary assumptions about selfhood, sexuality, and technological relationships into the realm of a disturbing, philosophical humor. In doing so, they position Crash as a thought experiment exploring the limits and essence of the terminal identity proposed by Bukatman. Both works ask what the absolute ends of this trajectory are. In taking ideas to outrageous conclusions, they use metaphysical humor to probe ideological infrastructure.

³¹ This suggests that parody, in its transformative nature, can overlap with adaptation, especially when it involves the transformation or reworking of an existing work. Linda Hutcheon also discusses the interaction of parody with other forms like satire, emphasizing the need to consider the entire enunciative act in any consideration of parody. Hutcheon, Linda, A Theory of Parody: The Teachings of Twentieth-Century Art Forms. Urbana and Chicago: University of Illinois Press, 2000, p. 23). This approach to understanding parody in relation to other forms might similarly apply to adaptations, as adaptations also involve re-contextualizing and transforming source material. This does not mean that there is a satirical intent in Cronenberg’s adaptation of Ballard.

Overall, humor in both works serves to underscore the surreal and disturbing nature of the story rather than provide light-hearted relief. The plural approach to humor within the works accounts for the difficulty to identify it. Additionally, the repetitive and monotonous quality of the novel's narrative has a numbing effect, and the reading experience, subsequently verges on boredom. The adaptation is more ambiguous. On the one hand, as Terry Harpold has argued, it showcases a "formalist sexual monotony [that] is obviously intentional" (1997). On the other hand, Cronenberg uses a strategy more akin to parody, and especially parody of the cinematic tropes of Hollywood, which contributes to the distinctive humor of the adaptation.

Different Approaches to Humor: The Questions of Genre and Medium

Incorporating Linda Hutcheon's theory of parody into the comparative analysis of the novel and its adaptation could provide a nuanced understanding of their differing approaches to humor, which could in turn help distinguish a more satirical touch in Ballard and a more parodic one in Cronenberg. Hutcheon insists that satire operates under the premise of disapproval, seeking to expose and correct the follies and vices of society through caricature and ridicule³⁴. Conversely, parody, while also engaging in critical distancing, does not inherently carry a negative judgment of the texts it contrasts (2000, p. 54). Parodic art is characterized by its deviation from and simultaneous inclusion of the aesthetic norm it references, suggesting a more nuanced, reflective form of critique that is not necessarily derogatory. In Hutcheon's framework, irony is pivotal as a nuanced rhetorical tool in both parody and satire, facilitating a complex intertextual dialogue rather than straightforward critique (ibid., pp. 31-32). This stands in contrast to Northrop Frye's interpretation, where irony, especially in satire, is deployed more aggressively to underscore and correct societal follies³⁵. Hutcheon posits irony as a marker of difference, essential for the ambivalence and reflective critique inherent in parody (ibid., p. xii). Thus, while Frye emphasizes irony's corrective purpose, Hutcheon highlights its capacity to foster a dialogic relationship between texts, underscoring the dynamic interplay between creator intent and audience recognition essential for the genres' evolution. On this aspect, my approach is more indebted to Hutcheon, who sees irony and satire as intrinsically connected. Satire, she argues, requires irony at its core. For her, satire is itself an ironic form, using irony as its central rhetorical and linguistic strategy.

The novel and its adaptation focus on the interplay between genre and medium, particularly how visual culture's language intersects with cars as cultural symbols. Ballard portrays characters whose desires and perceptions are shaped by an intense engagement with images, both real and imagined, suggesting a construction of identity through manufactured images and simulacra. Photography and cinema mediate their crash experiences, creating bodily identification with images. For instance, Vaughan's analysis of crash victims' photos in Chapter 11 reflects a psychological and physical connection to crash imagery, mirrored in his driving and social interactions. This chapter also covers a film shoot of crash scenes, where makeup simulates injuries, juxtaposed with a make-up artist's "reassuring sense of humor" against the backdrop of casualty ward realism (p. 87). This dark humor underscores the blending of reality and fiction, emphasizing cinematic crash portrayals' impact on real-life crash perceptions. By this process, "[t]he human is turned inside out, merging with the inorganic, the material. But in doing so, in exploding the human image, Ballard suggests that we are fashioned out of the images we make³⁶." The narrator often visualizes and aestheticizes scenes of violence with intense visual detail, immersing himself in imagined tableaux.

Ballard's novelistic use of the tableau vivant, blending cinematic aesthetics with literary tradition, marks a morbid, humorous contribution to social commentary. Traditionally, tableaux vivants—staged frozen pictorial moments³⁷. By referencing or imitating the tableau vivant in a narrative, authors can enhance character development, emphasize thematic elements, or create symbolic resonance that reverberates throughout the text. The use of tableau vivant in literature enables exploration of the boundaries between visual and textual storytelling. This engages readers in a multisensory interpretation that combines the immediacy of visual art with the depth of narrative. Ballard draws from and subverts the tradition of the tableau vivant as used in melodrama to construct his own brand of disturbing tableaux. Melodramas utilized *tableaux*³⁸. Rather than dominant melodramatic themes of injustice, domesticity, or trauma, Ballard aestheticizes wounds, machinery, and corpses. He also extrapolates the tendency of tableaux to make inner psychic content visible by projecting his characters' technological fantasies and damage onto exterior tableaux (Williams, p. 116). In terms of narrative form, while melodramatic *tableaux*³⁹ (idem.), in the novel, they fragment coherence and reason, deliberately clashing with readers' moral expectations. By warping a key melodramatic device to surreal, transgressive ends, Ballard signals his satirical critique of mediation, progress, and selfhood in late capitalist society. The characters pose in perverse "living-dead pictures," like Vaughan's staged car crash events. These events parody amateur *tableaux vivants*⁴⁰. Lifeless mannequins are described with visual aroused admiration (Chapter 12), subverting the conventional function of tableaux vivants to idealize living subjects. Car crash wounds and corpses are aestheticized as grotesque paintings, distorted through a series of juxtapositions and image fragmentations, undercutting notions of beauty, composure, and propriety associated with tableaux vivants. Once again, the overabundant descriptive language contrasts with the macabre tableaux, which are broken down to lurid details, like "photographs of grotesque wounds in a textbook of plastic surgery" (p. 1). Ballard parodies the media's sensationalist fixation on violence through a vivid portrayal that constitutes an ironic mimicry, reflecting society's morbid obsession with disaster, suggesting that in an image-saturated culture, reality itself becomes a distorted parody.

Mélanie Boucher provides a nuanced framework that can enhance the analysis of the different approaches to humor in the novel and its adaptation, based on the question of the medium⁴¹. Her examination of tableau vivant as a medium that oscillates between motion and immobility, and its ability to evoke the uncanny, aligns intriguingly with Ballard's subversion of narrative suspension. One could therefore argue that Ballard's depiction of car crashes as static yet dynamically charged moments mirrors the contemporary art tableau's blend of historical reference with personal narrative, thereby amplifying the uncanny humor in the novel. This underscores the transformative potential of tableau vivant in literature, highlighting how Ballard's novel utilizes these static moments of violent beauty not just for narrative pause but to explore technology, sexuality, and human vulnerability. When comparing Ballard's use of tableaux to Cronenberg's, it is possible to examine how the director translates these static—yet dynamic—moments into film. Cronenberg captures the essence of Ballard's tableaux through meticulous mise-en-scène, framing crashes and their aftermath as visually arresting, almost painterly compositions that evoke a similar sense of uncanny beauty and horror. This cinematic technique reflects the novel's combination of motion and stillness, using the film's visual language to further explore the interdependence between humans and machines. In doing so, Cronenberg not only pays tribute to the novel's thematic complexity but also takes advantage of the film's unique abilities to enrich the viewer's experience of these crucial moments, resulting in an adaptation that is a captivating examination of the translation of literary techniques into visual storytelling.

⁴⁰ It seems obvious that Cronenberg identified the narrator's emphasis on the element of parody in certain scenes, which is repeated several times in the novel. Chapter 1: "The broken postures of his legs and arms, the bloody geometry of his face, seemed to parody the photographs of crash injuries that covered the walls of his apartment" (p. 2). Chapter 10: "Gabrielle walked in the centre, her shackled legs in a parody of a finishing-school carriage" (p. 83).

For Cronenberg, this creates a differently layered intertextuality within the history of its own medium, and his observations take on a more diachronic approach. The tableau vivant has a significant position in the history of cinema as an intermedial representation, fulfilling several roles. Early cinema used frontal framed tableau shots as a means of condensing story⁴². Tableaux are used in mainstream Hollywood films for ornamental or rhetorical/ideological purposes, whilst art films exploit them in a self-reflexive manner to challenge traditional narrative structures (Peucker, 2007). But the tableau vivant originates in pornographic staging, which “figures the introduction of the real into the image—the living body into painting—thus attempting to collapse the distance between signifier and signified” (Pethő, 2015, p. 53). However, Ágnes Pethő sees the “tableau vivant as a reversal of this process, [...] in which embodiment is not erotic in nature [...] or, at least, not in its conventional sense, but can be related to what Mario Perniola described as ‘the sex appeal of the inorganic’” (idem.) resulting in a fascination with the image itself: not with painting viewed in the form of “real,” living, breathing bodies, but with bodies objectified as paintings. To back her analysis, Pethő adds that “[t]he tableau vivant is in fact a temporary cadaver, a presence which has petrified into object” (Satz, 2009, p. 56). Cronenberg's adaptation masterfully explores this, particularly in the scene where Vaughan, Ballard, and his wife witness a car crash, which turns out to involve Seagrave, who has died in the re-enactment of Jayne Mansfield's car crash (58'51"). They walk around the scene, half-tranced; Vaughan is taking pictures of the victims and the car, while Catherine has a cigarette as she sits next to one of the crash victims, who then turns around, looking almost directly into the camera (1h01'01"). There is a thematic significance of stasis in Crash as emblematic of a "still life" or death, rather than merely a narrative event. This perspective underscores the scene's resonance, aligning with the novel and film's exploration of the entwined relationship between technology and mortality. The tableau vivant serves as a mediator between life and death, capturing a moment of suspended animation that reflects the characters' existential and ontological dilemmas.

In the adaptation, Cronenberg inevitably compresses and omits certain elements of the novel, including its humor, and may appear, at first sight, to recoil from the novel's most radical aspects. Ironically, despite the hysteria it was received with in the UK and partly in the US, the film does retreat from the novel's most graphic, violent, and sexual content, partly due to its highly stylized, modernist aesthetics⁴³. On a more practical level, the film avoids showing certain elements simply due to censorship and the constraints of commercial cinema (Harpold, 1997). Stylistically, Crash compares to the modernist cinema of Antonioni and Bresson in its visual precision and emotional coldness. The film's transgressive content strains against its aesthetic perfectionism, reflecting Cronenberg's pessimism about liberation through abjection (Beard, 2001, p. 415-419). Ian Sinclair argues that these stylistic and narrative choices subtract the sharper political and cultural critique from Ballard's satire, making the film version feel more passive, elegant, and resigned compared with the novel (1999, p. 57). The visual style of the film is clean, cold, and elegant, lacking the "faecal mess" (ibid., p. 105) and grotesque imagery of the novel, thus aesthetically transforming the pornography into something "safe" (ibid., p. 57). Sinclair suggests that the film's flat affect and detached tone are a reduction of the manic energy in Ballard's novel (ibid., p. 106). According to him, Cronenberg's adaptation "depoliticizes Ballard's frenzied satire. He makes the pornography safe and elegant" (ibid., p. 122). If we stick to the psychiatric lexicon, the "flattened affect" can be understood as a negative rather than a positive symptom produced by the same diseased culture and casting choices regarding humor.

Harpold has pointed out that "[l]ike much of Cronenberg's work, Crash's narrative structure is determined more by the conventions of cinematic form than by its subject matter," but adds that "this is one of its weaknesses, but for reasons other than monotony" (1997). I would like to keep this formal observation but attempt a different evaluation and highlight how Cronenberg takes in Ballard's novelistic incarnation of visual culture and turns it into meta-cinematic humor. "We're about ready to go here" (4'40"): the first line of dialogue in the film occurs after the first scene, showing Catherine having sex in an airplane hangar with a stranger (2'55"). The scene is interrupted and cuts to the set of a car commercial shoot. The assistant director shouts, wryly: "Has anybody seen James Ballard. You know who I mean, the producer of this epic?" (4'04"). This sudden shift from an intimate, private act to the mundane, commercial world of filmmaking is jarring and unexpected, creating humor through contrast. In other words, the humor also comes from the incongruity of the situation, playing with the audience's expectations and the norms of cinematic narrative (the most important being that the sex scenes do not merely punctuate the plot, they constitute it). Furthermore, through the ironic use of the word "epic," Cronenberg indulges in self-referential humor, commenting on the industry's tendency to aggrandize or dramatize for effect. While his crew is looking for him, Ballard is having sex in a room with a camera girl (4'58"). The scene is interrupted (5'24"), cutting to Ballard meeting his wife back home, where she inquires about his adventure: "What about your camera girl, did she come?" to which Ballard replies, "We were interrupted" (6'10"). The film repeatedly cuts sex scenes, and there is humor in Cronenberg's manipulation of chronology and temporality and in the strategic and anticlimactic nature of sex scenes—an implicit critique of the commodification of sex in cinema.

In addition, the dual reference to "James Ballard," the character and the author of the novel the film is adapted from, blurs the line between the film's narrative world and the real world of the audience. However, in their joint interview, Ballard comments on Cronenberg naming the character "Ballard" in the film adaptation instead of "Cronenberg." Ballard expresses amusement and a hint of missed opportunity for Cronenberg to imprint his own humor to the adaptation. Ballard jests about filmmakers often disregarding the authors of the original material, though he quickly adds that Cronenberg achieved it in every other respect due to the brilliance of the film (Ballard and Cronenberg, 2021).

In this context, the film also deserves to be discussed as an "end-time variant" of the road movie genre, subverting its conventions and focusing on decay rather than adventure or travel (Brottman and Sharrett, 2002, pp. 118-119). Crash inverts the civilizing momentum and horizontal trajectory of traditional road films and westerns, transforming it into a downward spiral showing the implosion of bourgeois selves (pp. 121-123). Although Mikita Brottman and Christopher Sharrett never explicitly state that Crash is a parody of the road film, the analysis of how the film inverts, subverts, and exhausts road movie conventions clearly suggests this and deserves to be spelled out in the context of elucidating humorous strategies in Cronenberg's adaptation⁴⁴. Crash also offers a broader commentary on Hollywood. For instance, it does not indulge in the conventional resort to slow-motion to film action⁴⁵: all the car crashes happen very fast. The novel mentions this use of slow-motion on several occasions⁴⁶ and Cronenberg has also commented on it in one of his interviews:

I really wanted to avoid the clichés of an action picture, so there are no slow-motion shots and you don't see everything repeated from five different angles. One of the conceptual problems in making this film was dealing with action-movie logistics without making an action movie. I had to do the hard part without getting the goodies. I still had those 35 stunt drivers and had to choreograph them but also say, "I don't want the car to flip. I don't want to film it flying in slow-motion in the air and then explode." And even just where I put the cameras on the cars — I mean, two of the most photographed things in the world must be sex and cars (1997, np).

One of the most meta-cinematic moments in the film is the Seagrave accident. The scene is lit by projectors, and the car crash is revealed to the audience as a shooting set. Vaughan acts as a director and photographer, moving Catherine around and having her pose in one of the crashed cars (1h1'55"). In addition, as Christine Cornea argued, Cronenberg's Crash foregrounds issues of performance, with characters self-consciously shaping their realities through "performance art" (2004, p. 9). This meta-cinematic dimension constitutes a strong element of directorial interpretation that affects not only the aesthetics but also the politics of the film, and it is also related to Cronenberg's unique brand of humor. The "neat" and polished visual style of the film, contrasting with Cronenberg's choice of acting style, introduces a "sense of surface, of superficiality" and lacks emotional depth or subtext (ibid., p. 4). This "vacuous quality" may grant the director more freedom to impose meaning or encourage more critical viewing as the film

⁴⁴ Brottman and Sharrett's primary focus is on the film's symbolism, narrative structure, and thematic content, particularly its commentary on modernity, technology, and human desire. But the analysis of the road movie can be extended to some formal cinematic aspects.

⁴⁵ Slow motion is a technique that gained popularity after the 1960s and has become a ubiquitous element of modern film language. Slow motion is often used to intensify scenes of violence or spectacle, among other canonized applications. See Detig, Cameron, "Slow Motion in the Age of Intensified Continuity," Film Matters, vol. 12, n°1, March 2021, pp. 7-16.

⁴⁶ "In his vision of a car-crash with the actress, Vaughan was obsessed by many wounds and impacts—by the dying chromium and collapsing bulkheads of their two cars meeting head-on in complex collisions endlessly repeated in slow-motion films" (p. 1); "Vaughan screened slow-motion films of test collisions that he had photographed with his cinecamera" (p. 3)

parodies and extrapolates tendencies of Method acting which aim for psychological realism (ibid., p. 6-8). Furthermore, the blank, distanced acting resonates with shifts from depth to surface in postmodern culture described by Fredric Jameson⁴⁷. The use of tableau vivant in both the novel and the adaptation is ironic as it transforms static images into dynamic sites of both narrative progression and obstruction. This parallels the juxtaposition and the complex interplay between Method acting's emotional depth and the characters' often detached affect from the carnage they are involved in; a cinematic technique that Cronenberg employs to create a visual irony. The tension between the visceral and the cerebral in Ballard's narrative is reflected in this dynamic.

Having explored the complex interplay of humor with irony, satire, and parody in both Ballard's novel and Cronenberg's adaptation, I shall now consider some aspects related to the reception of the two works decades after their publication and release.

Re-Reading the Human in Crash through Humor

Recent re-evaluations of both works reveal new paradoxes in their reception. An over-emphasis on the initial Crash controversy can give the wrong impression: both Ballard's novel and Cronenberg's adaptation are now seen as canonical, extensively analyzed in academic and critical circles. They are frequently discussed in literary and film studies; Ballard's novel is widely taught; Cronenberg's adaptation was added to the Criterion Collection, and it was re-released in 2020. As Luckhurst pointed out, the successive controversies that have kept renewing critical discourse going about the novel have "either [been] forcing a moral commitment on it or falling into involuntary repetition or discursive mimicry" (2005, p. 519). To escape this deadlock, he recommends acknowledging the avant-garde traditions that both Ballard's text and its critical interpretations participate in, particularly in their effort to transform science fiction from a pulp genre⁴⁸ into one of the most significant literary forms of the century. He also urges a return to the novel's historical and cultural context for a more nuanced understanding, by moving beyond the text's surface-level provocations to explore its engagement with the socio-technological landscape of its time. In the last two decades, however, literary criticism has merely added new theoretical frameworks to the "discursive mimicry" of the past. Crash has therefore also been studied from the point of view of trauma⁴⁹, or the combination of Marc Augé's theory of non-place and Michel Foucault's heterotopias⁵⁰. I would argue that the humor of Ballard's novel and Cronenberg's adaptation contributes significantly to the question of genre (not only science fiction) in both media.

Peter Bradshaw reviewed the film in The Guardian in 2020, when it was re-released and made two claims I would like to discuss. First, that "in the 21st century, the press appetite for denouncing shocking films just seemed to vanish;" second, that "The controversy has aged badly, but Crash itself holds up well. But it is still deeply strange and risky; particularly, it risks being *laughed at*⁵¹, and there is a definite, tiny grain of Razzie absurdity that is a part of its weirdly hypnotic high-porn torpor." In her review of the novel, which introduces newer editions, Zadie Smith highlights new possible misreadings. I would like to contrast them with Bradshaw's assertions (as some of these cross-over with the reception of the film as well) to nuance and partly challenge them:

I was in college when the Daily Mail went to war with the movie, and found myself unpleasantly aligned with the censors, my own faux-feminism existing in a Venn diagram with their righteous indignation. We were both wrong: Crash is not about humiliating the disabled or debasing women, and in fact the Mail's campaign is a chilling lesson in how a superficial manipulation of liberal identity politics can be used to silence a genuinely protesting voice, one that is trying to speak for us all. No one doubts that the abled use the disabled, or that men use women. But Crash is an all, the dynamics of human societies [the traditional novel tends to depict society as static], and man's place in the universe. However crudely or naively, science fiction at least attempts to place a philosophical and metaphysical frame around the most important events within our lives and consciousness" (p. 7).

existential book about how everybody uses everything. How everything uses everybody (p. xi).

Her acknowledgment of her own initial misinterpretation underscores the subtlety and complexity of Ballard's themes and the importance of re-evaluating initial reactions to the novel. Her warning is that moral panic around representational politics risks missing the universality of Ballard's dystopian vision and satire, and enforcing censorship, which can be extended to Cronenberg's masterful adaptation. Nuance is essential to separate boundary-pushing critique from offense. Smith's insights counter Bradshaw's claims, questioning his observations of a societal shift towards acceptance or desensitization to controversial films. She unveils a complex interpretation, critiquing her "faux-feminism" alignment with censors and highlighting the risk of misunderstanding multifaceted narratives like Crash. Smith points out Ballard's novel explores existential themes, contrasting with Bradshaw's view of the film's "weirdly hypnotic high-porn torpor." This contrast reveals misinterpretation risks, suggesting controversies may arise from superficial engagement rather than deep understanding of its themes.

Journalists and critics like Bradshaw⁵² or Sebastian Groes argue that the concern with the car as a cultural landmark is now dated⁵³. Groes stresses that Ballard is not a purely "prophetic" writer, as Crash reflects anxieties of the time about motorways and suburban life. There is no questioning the fact that both the novel and the adaptation have left a longstanding legacy. Sinclair has already offered some insight on how the film Crash impacted interpretations of Ballard's novel as well as real-world events like Princess Diana's death (2015, pp. 113-117). But beyond car-culture, both the novel and the film engage with questions of identity, via image and technology underscoring the complexity of their anticipatory insights into post-humanity. Bukatman (1993) first read Ballard's

Bradshaw also stresses that the film already seemed dated when it was released, compared to the novel: "But Crash is no longer so contemporary. Even in the late 90s, it didn't quite have the zeitgeisty charge of the book, which had come out 20 years previously. Cars themselves (and certainly airports) aren't really as sexy and urgent as they could plausibly be presented by Ballard, as part of his eerily disquieting atrocity exhibition of modern life. Cars themselves have become far more boring and reliable and safe in our culture. Nowadays, the airbag of banality is deployed" (2020).

novel as a posthuman text in the 1990s via his theory of terminal identity. In recent years, the critical interest in posthuman theory produced a renewed interest in both the novel and the film. Ballard's and Cronenberg's focus on altered forms of consciousness and identity in a technologically saturated world, depicting characters exhibiting a strong desire to go beyond conventional human experiences and boundaries, is a key posthuman concern. Emma Whiting suggests that the redefinition of identity in the context of technological interfacing and altered states of consciousness challenges traditional notions of what it means to be human (Baxter and Wymer, 2012). Ballard's work has also been interpreted as "anti-humanist," "using speculative fiction to imagine radical posthuman evolution resonating with post-structuralism in de-centering the human subject and giving primacy to technology in shaping desires and bodies"⁵⁴. Barbara Klonowska argues the novel has an "optimistic view" of technology's potential, while the film takes a more critical dystopian view⁵⁵. The film does indeed seem to show a "messy" and "fragmented" integration of human/machine, unlike more "clean" mainstream sci-fi films (Cornea, p. 14). But there does not seem to be any consensus on this point. Guilhem Billaudel, for instance, examined the role of cars in Cronenberg's films Crash and Cosmopolis, arguing that cars transcend their role as mere props or symbols of consumerism. Instead, they become integral characters, deeply connected with the films' human characters and the narrative itself⁵⁶. Both the novel and its adaptation reflect the paradoxical nature of humans striving to transcend their biological constraints through technology, embodying a simultaneous fascination and repulsion. This phenomenon resonates with Günther Anders' concept of "Promethean shame"—the discomfort stemming from humans recognizing their own obsolescence relative to their technological creations' superior efficiency and permanence⁵⁷. Despite the attendant existential unease, we remain eager to integrate with self-surpassing technologies, amplifying the irony. Anders encapsulates the profound ambivalence undergirding the posthuman condition, our simultaneous pride in achievement and philosophical unease in the face of our potential replaceability. His perspective lays bare the emotional and philosophical depths pervading our complex entanglement with technology — framing it as an uneasy dance oscillating between aspiration, disillusionment, and reflection upon our shifting place in this increasingly technologized world.

I would argue that both the transhuman and the posthuman readings⁵⁸ are partly, if not mainly, possible because reading humor in the works continues to be so strongly resisted and through a tendency to “elevate” the pathology of the characters to a form of new normality⁵⁹. Or, to borrow Luckhurst incisive critique of “discursive mimicry”: “[Again], Crash is not read so much as reiterated in a different register” (2005, p. 516). If Freud is right in pointing out humor’s role in exposing human limitations to create a sense of common humanity, missing the humor in the reading implies missing the human. The novel’s overlooked humor also lies in the narrative, in its ironic use of “complex,” for example, to describe technology, sexuality, and psychology, highlighting narrative irony. This term is applied to vehicle and machine parts with detailed descriptions like “the complex geometries of a dented fender” and “complex interchanges” (p. 5, p. 7), paralleling vehicles to human anatomy. Characters are attributed with “complex pleasure” and “complex affections” (p. 25, p. 56), and sex acts are termed “complex” in “stylized postures” (p. 123), adding layers to their psychological portrayal. Vaughan, depicted with a “complex personality,” ironically distances the reader due to his psychopathic tendencies. This repeated use of “complex” underscores a ritualized, dark essence, ironically juxtaposing ostentatious language against shallow character depths, critiquing modern psychological and sociological methods. Frye’s notion that irony in literature implies minimal direct statement (2000, p. 40) is echoed here, suggesting a satirical critique by Ballard through superficial depth, despite portraying a nuanced view of humanity’s darker undercurrents.

As for Cronenberg, his irony has an equally humoristic touch. The first time Ballard asks Vaughan about the nature of his project, he gets the following response, breaking the fourth wall yet again: “The reshaping of the human body by modern technology” (40’07”). The second time he asks the question, repeating Vaughan’s expression word for word (“What about the reshaping of the human body by modern technology?”) (53’10”), Vaughan replies: “that’s just a crude sci-

⁵⁸ The transhuman lenses applaud pursuits of morphic freedom in Crash as mankind’s self-overcoming while posthuman critique provocatively unpacks how interfacing bodies and machines exposes ontological liminalities rather than uplifting humanity per se.

fi concept. It kinda floats on the surface and doesn't threaten anybody" (53'18"). This dialogue effectively critiques the superficial transhuman and posthuman understandings of the film. Cronenberg seems to be acknowledging the allure of such themes in science fiction while simultaneously downplaying their seriousness or applicability. This self-referential humor not only adds a layer of complexity to the film's narrative but also challenges overly literal or uncritical interpretations of its themes.

Both Ballard's and Cronenberg's irony and humor critique transhuman and posthuman interpretations by emphasizing human flaws amidst technological fusion, underscoring absurdities rather than idealizing the posthuman condition. Their work reveals complexities in human-technology integration, using dark humor as a defense against dehumanization and preserving human individuality against mechanization.

Conclusion

Humor has long been overlooked in both works, but it has been easier in recent years, for critics at least, to discern it both in the film and the novel, even if such readings remain quite marginal. The transgressive content and clinical prose style, or neat film aesthetics, have remained barriers to discerning the dark humor interwoven through satire and parody, in the form of irony, incongruous language, and exaggerated scenarios. Yet re-reading the humor reveals new insights. Ballard's strategic literary techniques establish an undercurrent of unsettling, morbid comedy by clashing his detached narrative voice with disturbingly poetic descriptions of disfigured bodies and violent sexuality. Like a Swiftian satirist, he uses rational language to describe irrational obsessions, underscoring absurdity. Cronenberg translates this in the film through a jarring, modernist visual style contrasting with affectless performances and sudden disruptions of sex by mundane events. Moreover, I have attempted to show how missing humor and metaphor enabled problematic posthuman elevation of the characters' pathology as pioneering new subjective possibilities. Overlooking Ballard's and Cronenberg's black comedy leads to techno-utopian readings. But their grotesque scenarios should highlight the lingering humanity rather than transcend it. The metaphoric fusion of flesh and machine manifests physically and mentally as a humorous, satirical allegory of society's increasing interfacing with technology and a parody of overdone Hollywood tropes, rather than a liberating endpoint. The works' quality comes not from technophilic celebration but, partly, from a Swiftian disgust at commercialized dehumanization or meta-cinematic commentary, and partly, as a straightforward, non-moralizing thought experiment. Ultimately, the humor in both works spotlights the grotesque consequences of social conditioning and reader complicity.

However, fully recognizing this complex dimension of Ballard's and Cronenberg's artistic visions requires relinquishing assumptions about the purpose of humor solely as a soothing device. Their transgressive comedy actively creates discomfort. And as demonstrated through emerging re-appraisals decades later, allowing Crash's demanding humor to unsettle audience expectations can open spaces for new interpretations that better appreciate both its enduring emotional power and socio-cultural commentary. In the end, humor proves to be ontologically ambivalent in unlocking the layered significances within Ballard's and Cronenberg's startling imaginative worlds. The alarming cruelty and seductiveness of their semi-satirical semi-prophetic work compels self-reflection on humanity's present trajectory down isolated tunnels of alienating technology, speed, and obsession with images.

Myrto Petsota has taught languages, literature, and translation in secondary and higher education for over a decade. She completed a Ph.D. on Italo Calvino at the University of Edinburgh in and recently obtained a doctoral contract for a second Ph.D. at Paul Valéry University Montpellier 3. The main hypothesis of her current research is that contemporary British fiction, built on the ruined landscape of progress, explores the anthropological deadlock of humankind in the age of neoliberalism, and outlines a new project that challenges the theoretical claims of posthumanism.
